

RE-flower 12

The subject of this series is the plant named rough comfrey

It is a plant I know well. It stands tall right outside my property. But what is just outside is in fact soil that I have removed from my own land ... maybe the plant was in my garden before the pervasive cultivation, where grass was sown ... the grass that is now moss ...

Anyway, rough comfrey is very busy in the spring, setting purple flowers over the summer, collapsing completely at fall's first solid night frost. During winter it is gone.

It is a foreigner. It was originally imported as a crop in order to be used for feeding pigs ... but this idea has now been abandoned.

Now I use it ... I have a stand-in. This is how I experience it. And in this series, it is called rough comfrey.
